THE POSTMAN.

You have often seen him pass through the fields with a hasty step, recognizable not only by his blouse and regulation step, but also by the sustained activity of his movements, because for him the instants are counted and he has not the right to slacken his pace. An indefatigable walker, he accomplishes his task from ures to become motionless, though the cold be Siberian, though it blow and his route to carry the letters, newspapers and prospectuses which trade opportunity to east a furtive glance confides by millions to the care of the over his shoulder.

I knew a man who for twenty years filled this position. A former soldier, ence, he had obtained the great favor ried, as if he had not the full number. of having placed to his credit fifty francs per month at the postoffice of the district.

Pere Martin was not very fond of this brilliant position, but he perfectly understood his responsibility and duties; he never complained. Everybody in the district was acquainted with this little gray-haired steel. He was highly appreciated, for, while a scrupulous observer of the regulation, he never refused to perform a service, provided it did not

Hence the notes concerning him were excellent, and his chiefs regretted that the parsimony of the administration only permitted them to re-ward his loyal services with contemptible gifts.

One day in the middle of October he departed on his usual round. The weather was frightful; it had been raining incessantly for more than a rents; what foliage remained on the trees was so impregnated with water suddenly demanded his attention and that it could not offer a protecting shelter. The postman, wet to the skin, walked with the impassability of

The postman was silent. He re membered having heard the woman at the drinking house call the man he had met there by that name. He asked himself in consternation if the letter had been stolen from him, but he recalled all the circumstances and certain that the epistle had not been at the chief town of the district to

He hastened away and when he was alone his fears regained possession of him. He again began to doubt, and little by little he was seized upon by a terror he could not explain. He increased his pace and leaped over the hedges and ditches with unusual nimbleness. Unfortunately, his round thrt day was exceptionally long, and the bad weather in addition had considerably delayed him.

He reached the postoffice a little later than was his custom. The wo-man who distributed the mails, on being consulted by him, affirmed that he had taken away a letter for Madame Andre. Cree of her assistants confirmed this declaration.

The postman was thunderstruck He saw with fright the heavy responsibility thrown upon him. His terrors augmented when he remembered that time and again, at the moment of the opening the mail bags, a man had presented himself, asking if there been seen. He had gone by some time before. The joy of return had given wings to his feet, as the thought of a misfortune to be averted had increased the speed of the postman. There was no longer even the shadow of a doubt; the fated man had taken the path which led straight to the Moulin-Brule. Pere Martin calculated that by passing over another path, which, however, was rough and dangerous, he could yet arrive before him. He hastened on and reached the tatal spot when the night was already advanced. The place was well fitted for an ambuscade. There was a species of cut through the rocks. On both sides bushes trees formed an impenetrable shade; rapidly moving clouds at each instant veiled the moon. the wan rays of which added to the sinister character of the landscape.

He paused; amid the rustling of the foliage agitated by the wind he thought he heard the sound of approaching footsteps; it was, doubtless Georges Andre, whom he had preceded only by a few instants; he was about going to meet him when the report of a gun rang out and a ball struck him full in the breast. The assassin emerged from a neighboring thicket; but on approaching in a horrible oath; he had recognized Georges Andre. The blade of a knife flashed in his hand, but he was not allowed time to use it-a club descended vigorously upon his head and felled him to the ground.

A woman distracted with terror, at this moment threw herself on the postman's body.

"Oh! how wretched I am!" cried she, "I foresaw it; he has been killed!" Madame Andre had not been able to subdue her uneasiness, and at the hour she supposed her husband ought to arrive, she had come to wait for him; at the report of the gun she had run forward precipitately.

"Jeanne," said her husband to her,

"It was not you? Who, then, has he assassinated?" They bent over Martin's body, and recognized him in the moonlight which at that instant illuminated his face and uniform.

'reassure yourself; I am unhurt.'

The husband and wife carried him to their home, where he lived only twenty-four hours. He related how he had allowed to be stolen from him gence, even if he should be compelled to offer his life in exchange for that of the father of a family whom he had involuntarily helped to place in peril. Obscure victim of duty, he had added another to the list of those unremembrance they should leave behind him.
